Military service provides gateway to great careers

Training for top jobs is another benefit of military service. Just ask the local recruiters.

According to Army Sergeant Jeffrey Albert, a CBRN (chemical, biological, radiological and nuclear) designation gives him access to a variety of careers. "I can transition those skills into FEMA incident response, natural disasters, radiation clean-up or preventative measures, handling hazardous materials," he said.

Soldiers suit up for hazardous materials inspection.

PJs, or pararescuers, go through water rescue school, ranger school and are the most important asset of the Air Force. They are paramedics as well. "I like to call them the guardian angels. Most people don't know this, but PJs were with Seal Team 6," said Air Force Sergeant David Howells. Their skills are transferrable to law enforcement, disaster management and federal government posts.

In the Navy, the hottest job is in nuclear propulsion. The specialized training allows sailors to work on the nuclear submarines and ships and after their service, to get a job in the nuclear energy industry. "This is the top job in the Navy right now," says Petty Officer Austin Purdy.

For the Marines, the occupation that is most sought after is intelligence, whether a specialist in counter-intelligence or linguistics. "This is because we work hand-in-hand with the CIA and FBI on operations," said Staff Sergeant Jonathan Anderson. Visit with a recruiter during lunch May 3.
